S&W, King's Daughters merger busted

BY JANICE GIBBS

The Federal Trade Commission has put a halt to Scott & White taking over King's Daughters Hospital. Earlier in the year, King's Daughters Hospital board let it be known the hospital was in financial trouble and could no longer operate as community hospital. After looking for another health care system to merge with, or to take over the Temple facility, the KDH board OK'd a proposal by Scott & White to merge with the facility and convert it into a regional children's hospital.

The transfer of ownership to Scott & White became effective April 1. Scott & White agreed to operate King's Daughters as an acute-care hospital until the conversion to a children's hospital was complete and received FTC approval. "We've been working with the FTC for some months and from their perspective, the merger of KDH with Scott & White was anti-competitive, with the market being the Temple/Belton region," said Dr. Alfred Knight, CEO and president of Scott & White Memorial Hospital. FTC has indicated KDH should remain an acute-care facility to provide options for patients. Knight said Scott & White disagrees with the judgment, but respects the commission's processes and decision making. "Our solution was either to litigate the decision or to reach a settlement with the FTC," he said. "Scott & White made the decision not to litigate, because it would be upward of a two-year process and it would leave King's Daughters Hospital vulnerable during that entire time."

Before Thursday, before a gunman killed 13 people and wounded 38, Fort Hood Police Department's Sgt. Kimberly Munley wrote on her twitter: "I live a good life ... a hard one, but I go to sleep peacefully @ night knowing that I may have made a difference in someone's life."

The 34-year-old civilian police officer was credited with stopping that gunman before he could kill more people.

Munley certainly made the difference she strove for — not in just some-

Hasan gave his household items to neighbor the morning before

KILLEEN — Quiet. Reclusive. Religious. Deadly. One day after Maj. Nidal Hasan reportedly gunned down more than 40 people on Fort Hood, killing 13, neighbors and co-workers say the image of a mass murderer is a stark contrast to the demure man who moved here from the East Coast in July.

If there was something sinister behind the devout Muslim's door number 9 and the drawn curtains on the second floor here at the Casa del Norte apartments, nobody noticed. He recently gave a few copies of the Muslim Holy Book, the Quran, to neighbors. And he always offered a common answer when neighbors asked how he was doing.

Justice of the peace, soldier recount the horrific day

BY PAUL A. ROMER
TELEGRAM STAFF WRITER

FORT HOOD — The justice of the peace who officially pronounced death on 12 soldiers and one civilian killed during a shooting spree Thursday at the Soldier Readiness Processing Center described the scene in one word: Carnage.

Justice of the Peace Garland Potvin said all the victims were killed in the lobby of the processing center, where paperwork was strewn all over the ground and furniture and partitions were turned over.

"It's a waste of our most valuable product," Potvin said about the soldiers who had been killed.

Potvin, a veteran of crime scenes who served as a spokesman for the 1991 Luby's massacre in Killeen, said he was impressed with the way Fort Hood officials handled the incident.

"They showed the utmost professionalism and care with those bodies on the ground," he said. "I think it was out of respect for those subjects, not just because it was their job."

Potvin said he ordered autopsies for all the bodies. He said the military would conduct the procedures.

The first death he was notified about was at Metroplex Hospital. After viewing that body, Potvin went back to his office before being called out to the shooting site where he ruled on other deaths.
